If your item has been finished in French Velvet please take a moment to read the following information:

It is impossible to prevent pressure marks in velvet. However, these quickly disappear when unpacked and left to breathe. With careful handling and a proper understanding of its nature, products made from velvet can be enjoyed for many years. If the pile does become crushed, the angle of the pile alters, which may result in areas of the pile appearing lighter or darker in shade. This is often described as pressure marking, which can easily be mistaken for uneven dyeing or manufactures fault. Newly made velvet products usually need time to condition in the atmosphere after unpacking. During this time the pile will relax and lift, improving the richness and the lustre of the velvet. If any pressure marking continues to persist, a light steaming or gentle brushing in the direction of the pile will also be beneficial.

Pile direction – there is no hard and fast rule about this but here are some things to help you decide which you prefer:

Pile up (if you brush your hand upwards and the pile feels smooth, but if you brush your hand down, it feels harsher and the pile is disturbed) gives the colour a richer and deeper appearance and any pile disturbance will disappear more quickly as the pile relaxes and blooms. Pile down (the opposite to above) allows more light to be reflected from the velvet, so the shade will stay lighter and the pile will stay quite flat, with more of a sheen, and any pile disturbance will show more readily and take longer to fall out.
